SWING DING

THE gang met around the back table in the Teen Spot to discuss the coming affair. Gingy Baker rapped the table with her spoon to get attention. "Look, kids, my Dad went to school with Billy Woodrow, the band leader, and he says he can get Billy to play for the Swing Ding for practically nothing."

"Wow!" Art said enthusiastically. "That's super-keen, gang. We'll have every kid in town at the affair, and most of the grownups, too. We ought to raise plenty of dough for our Children's Relief Fund."

They were silent for a moment, lost in dreams. Gingy had been originator of the idea that the teen-age gang of the town organize a big entertainment evening with dancing and amateur acts. The money raised would help send food baskets to starving children in foreign countries.

A shadow slid across the table. Lucia Arkins, daughter of the local banker and the snootiest girl in town, bent over. "I couldn't help overhearing your childish schemes," she said haughtily. "Naturally, a jazz band would be your idea of entertainment. But I'm quite sure that adults would prefer something more cultured."

Gingy started an angry retort from habit. She and Lucia were bitter enemies. More than once Lucia had won some coveted prize by openly cheating Gingy out of it. Now suddenly her eyes narrowed and she choked back her harsh words. Instead she smiled sweetly, to the open amazement of the others. "Why, I believe Lucia is right. Perhaps we should have something more cultural. That's exactly what we'll do . . . and we'll see that Lucia gets credit for the whole idea."

"Now, just a minute, Gingy Baker," Lucia said, alarmed. "Don't you dare try any funny stuff . . ."

"Lucia darling, how could I?" Gingy purred. "It was your very own idea and you should get all the credit."

When Lucia had gone, the kids glared at Gingy. "What's the big idea of letting the droop spoil our fun? Are you dizzy?"

"Never mind," Gingy said. "You sell tickets and see that everyone comes. Leave the rest to me. I think we'll manage to satisfy all the culture-bugs as well as the human beings in town."

A few days later posters were hung everywhere, advertising the Charity Night. Prominently featured was the notice that there would be a special concert by the famous Professor Guillermo Treelane. To all questions, Gingy remained tight-lipped, but there was a sparkle in her eye. Every poster and every notice bore the announcement in big letters that the idea of this cultural program was Lucia's.

On Charity Night the auditorium was crowded. Lucia, who had decided to take full advantage of the mysterious publicity, had a front seat and wore a special evening gown. The first part of the program was a variety show by local talent that went over with a big bang.

Then Gingy stepped to the stage. "Ladies and gentlemen: the next feature will be some super-cultural music by a renowned director I want you all to know that we kids planned a Swing Ding dance session for this part. But dear Lucia Arkins persuaded us that you people would prefer culture. So here is your culture."

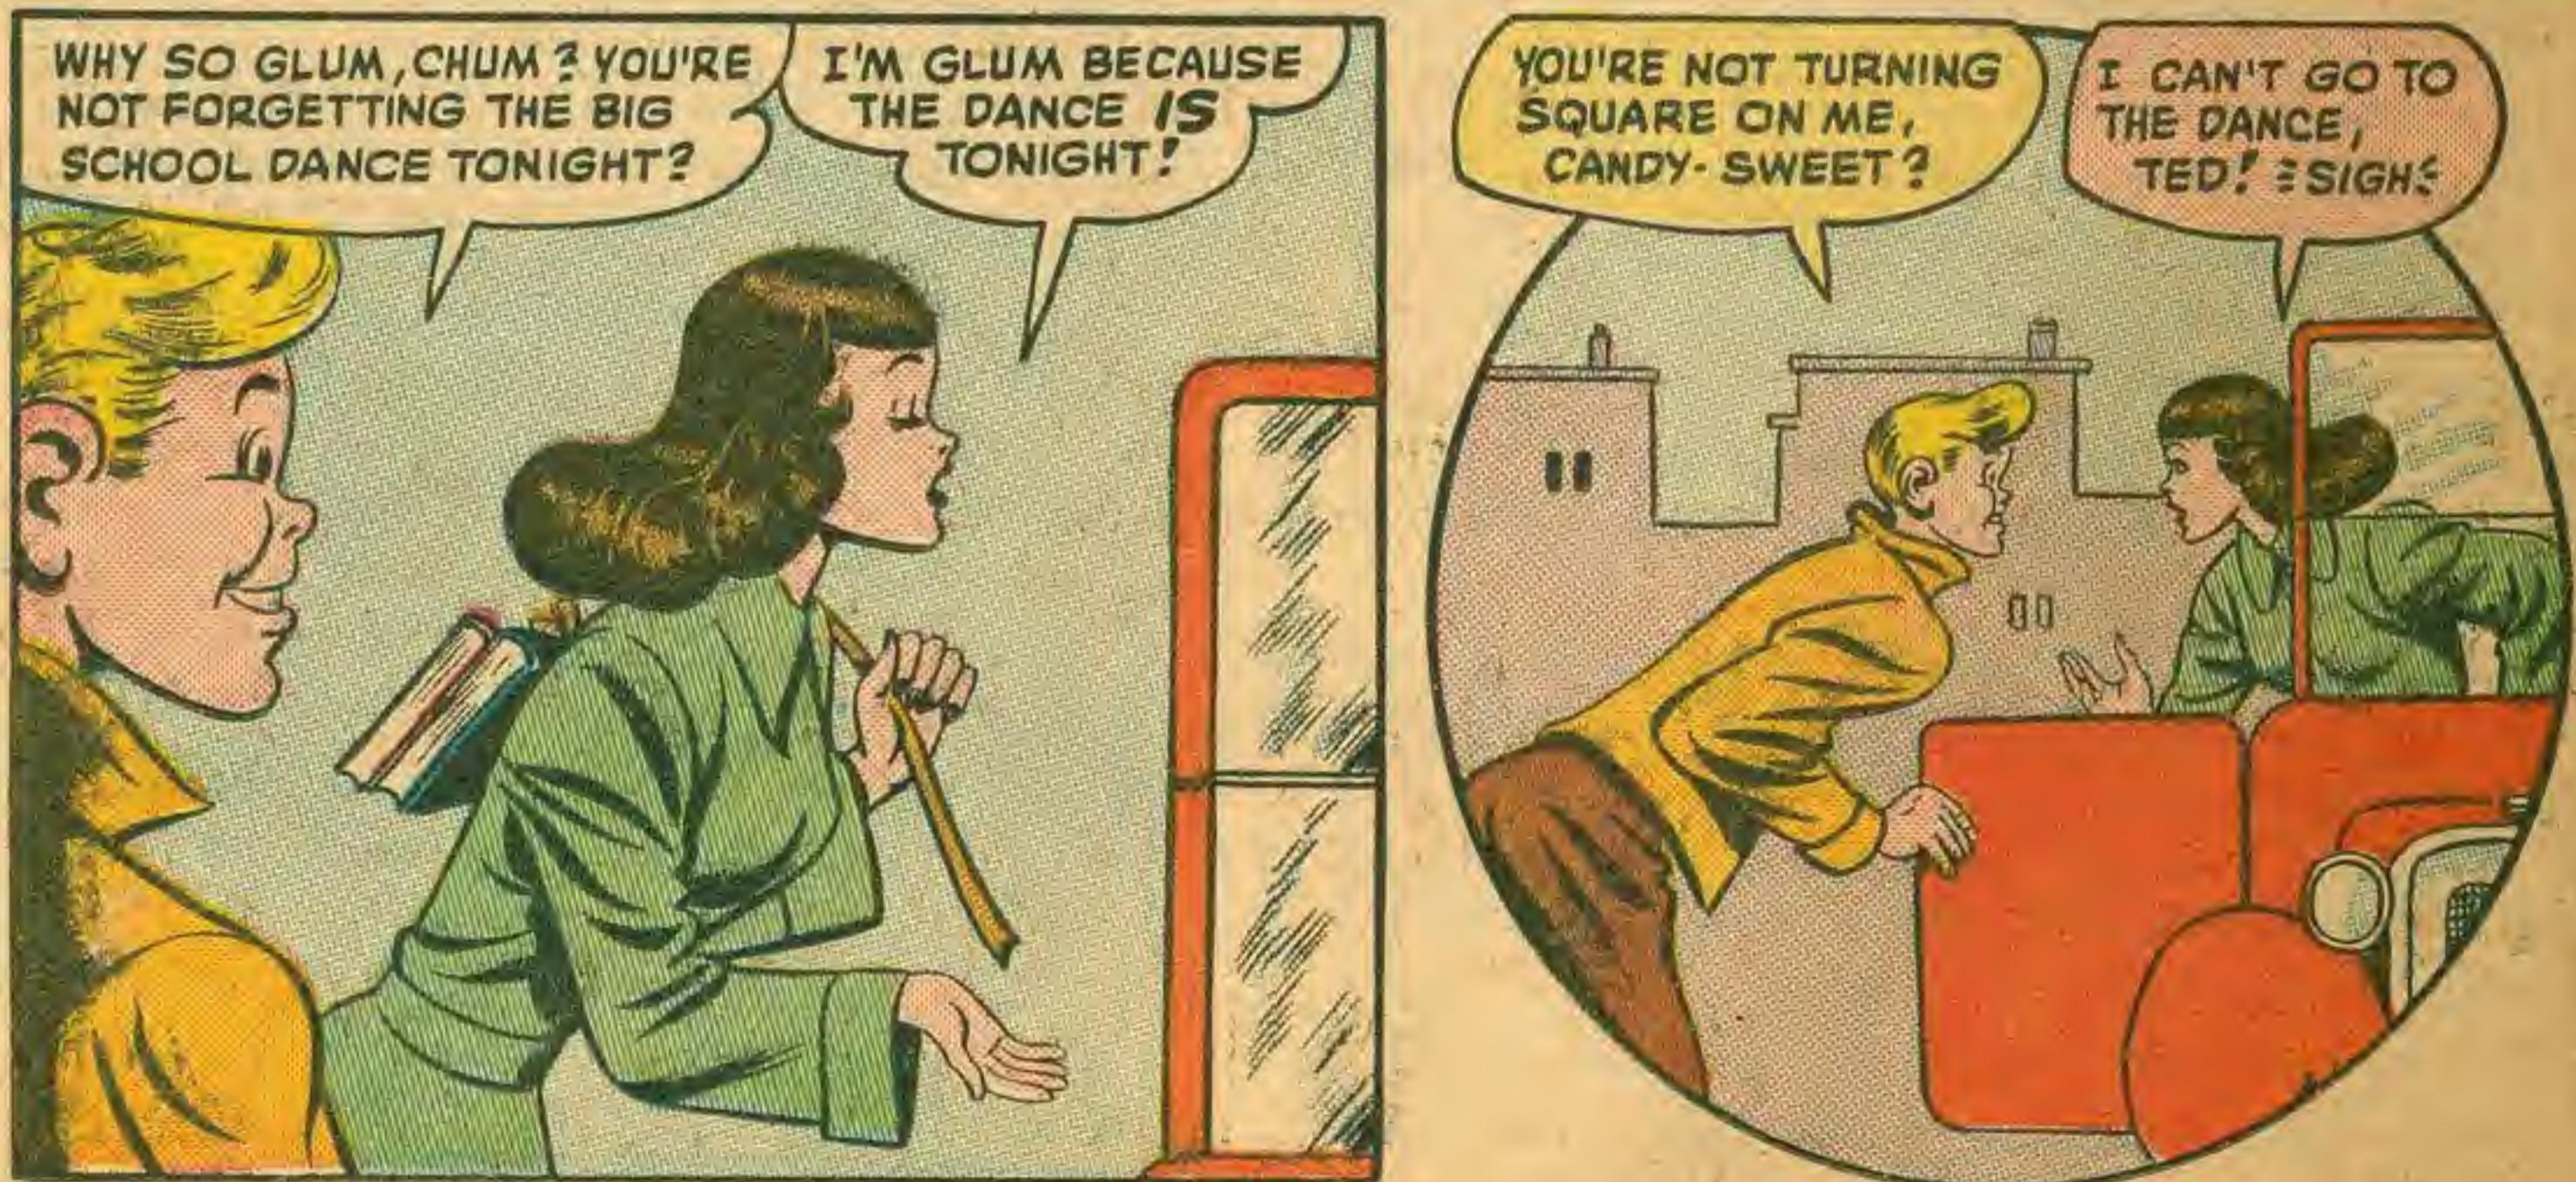

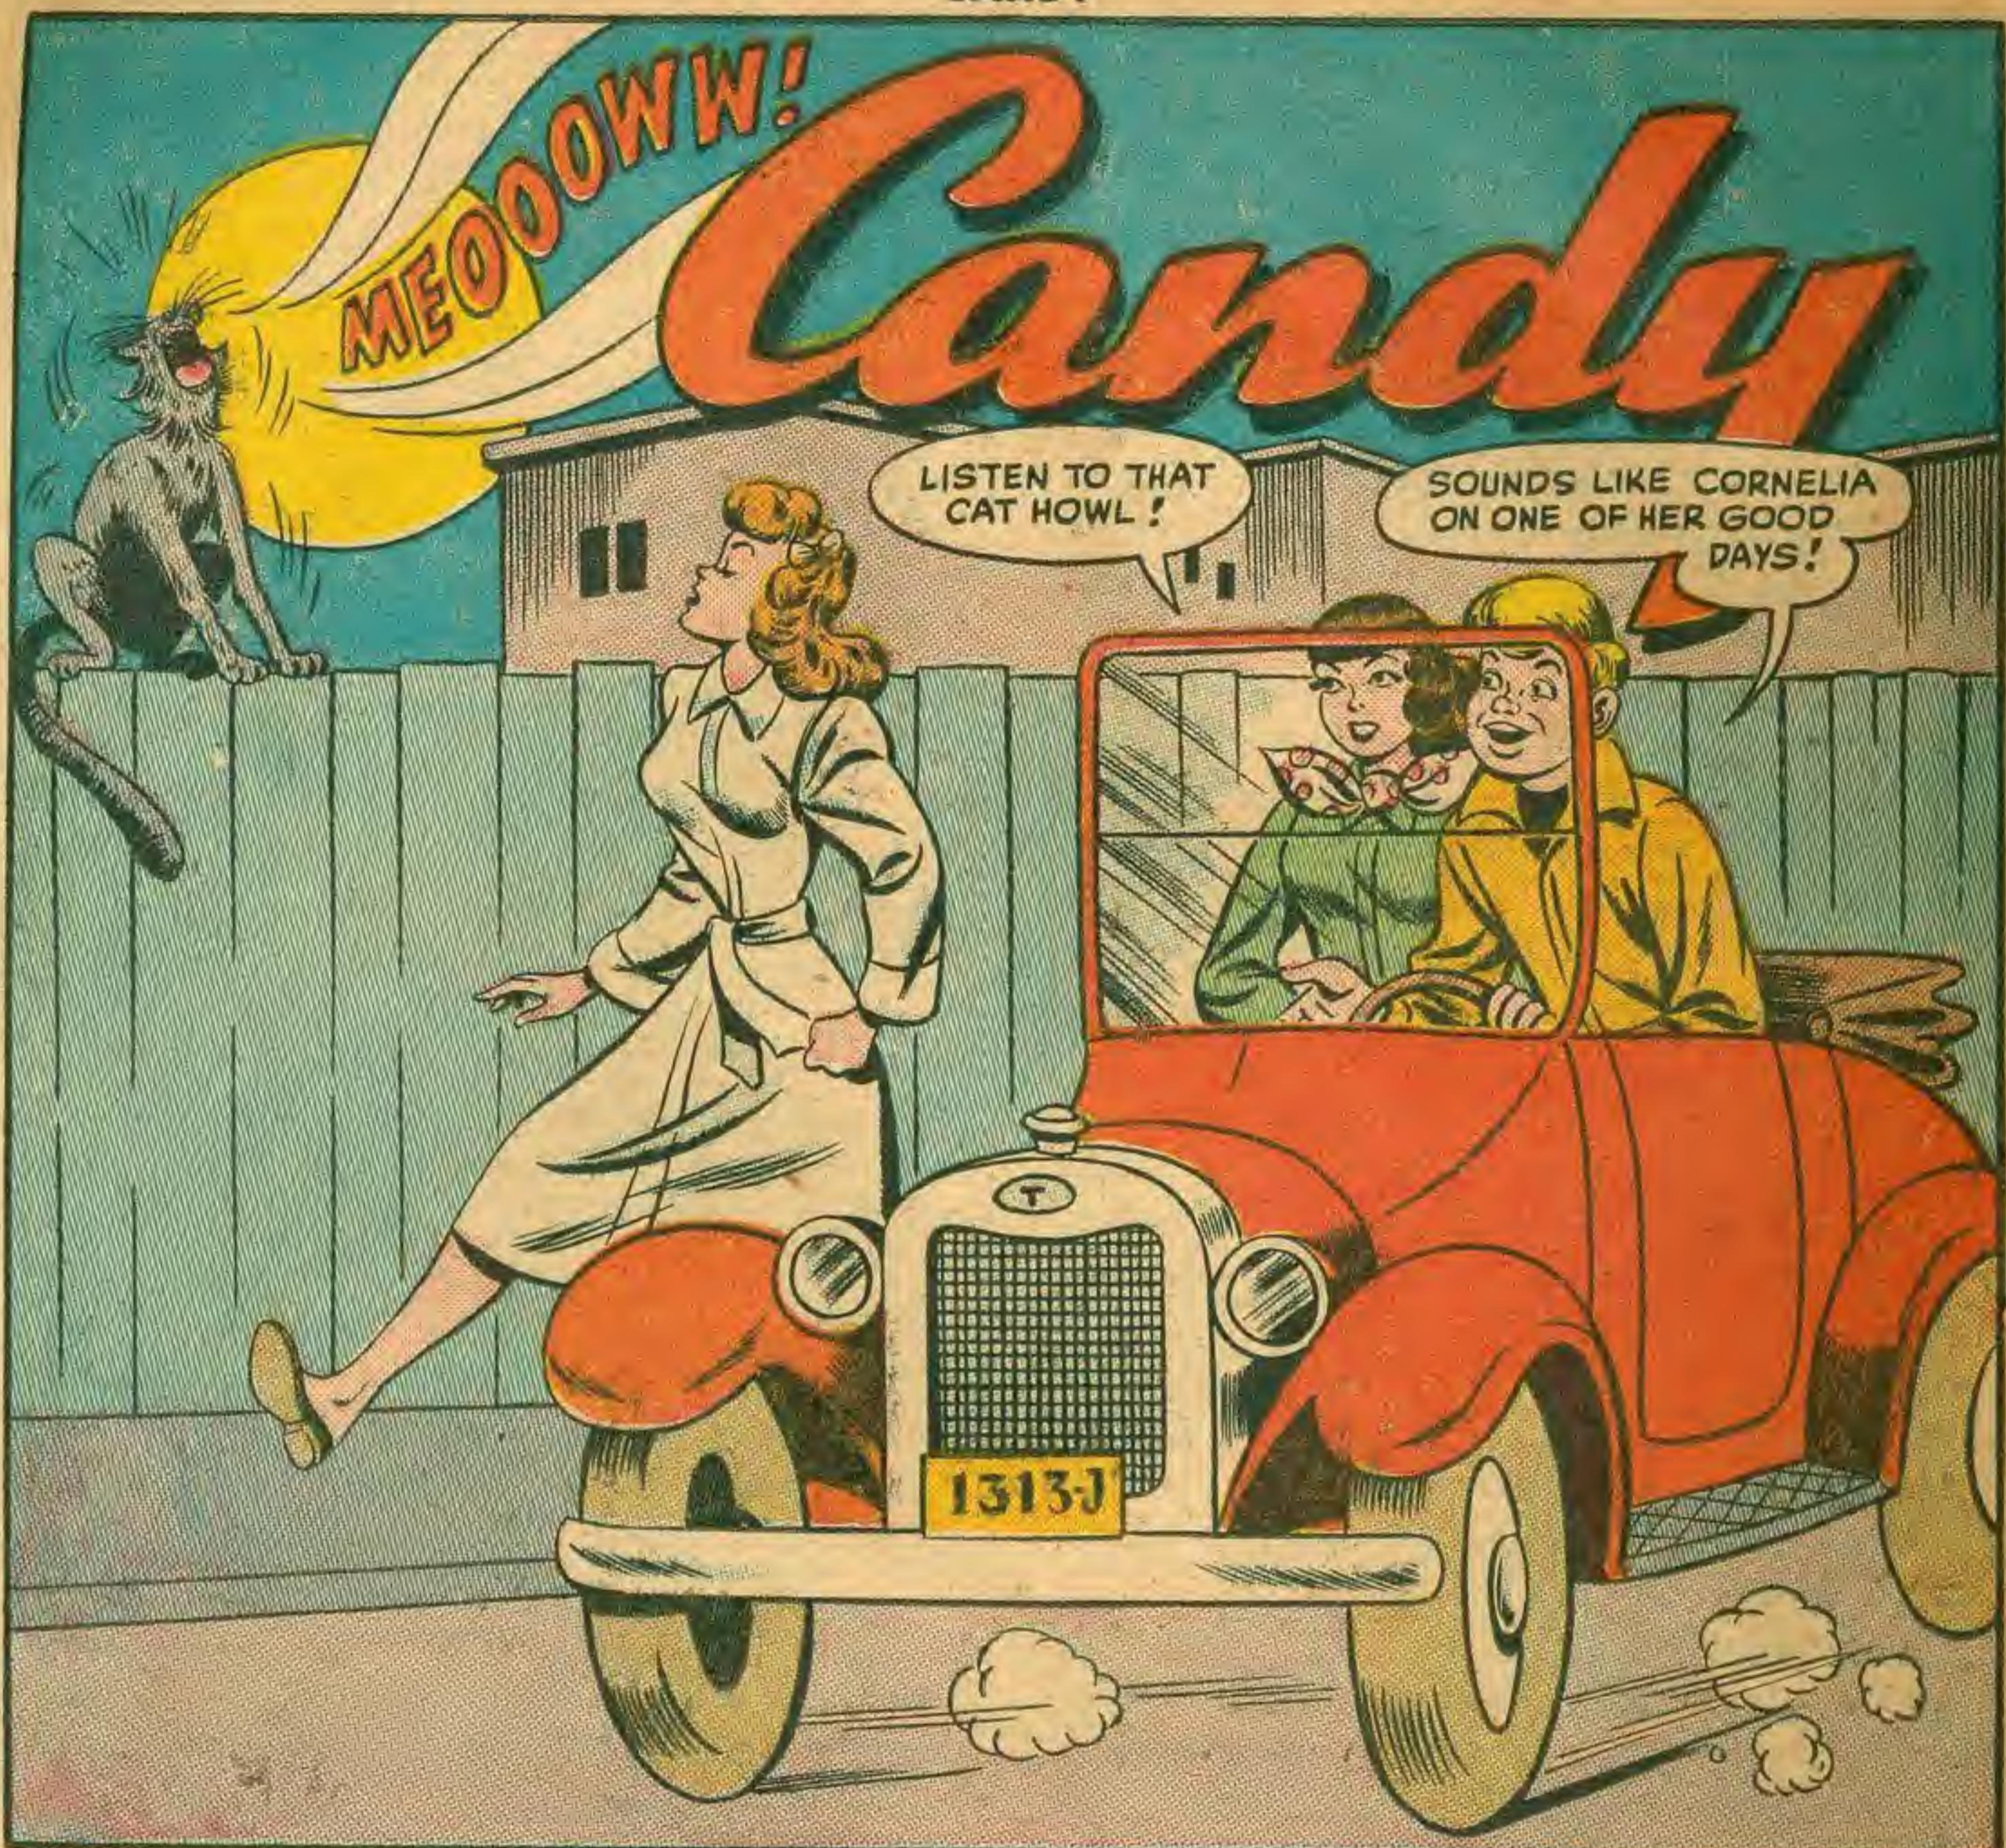

A group of solemn, heavily-bearded men in evening clothes took their places on the platform and began to play. It was long-haired music of the slowest kind. It sobbed and dragged and droned while the audience fidgeted and even Lucia's father gave his daughter a look of disgust. A few daring souls tried to slip out but were stopped at the door and gently but firmly returned to their seats.

When the number ended, Gingy stepped up again. "That was Lucia's contribution to the show, folks. Now we thought you'd like ours, too, for contrast." And with the words, the solemn musicians snatched off false beards and went into a lively jump number that had feet dancing in no time.

Billy Woodrow, alias Guillermo Treelane, popped out from behind an immense false beard and waved his baton. "Let's dance!"

But for a few minutes the sound of the music was drowned in the roaring cheers that went up for Gingy Baker and the Teen-Age gang!
